The flab famine--The capture of the white nwau and the white spiritual men driven away. The people in those days were so interested in these poor and unfortunate ones, that men would go and build winter wigwams and move them near those bogs from which they could secure their daily food. After the food game had been found the people became more contented, and with a composure waited for the summer to come. During the snow and ice period no sickness or death was reported and the good health seemed to prevail among all, until the hot weather came, when some were taken with the bad cough, in some cases death was the result, because the medicine could not be properly administered to all. Before the winter came to a close, some of the people, who were less favored with the natural patience got very much discontented notwithstanding the new discovery made, but bad gone around to agitate a spirit among the people for a southern exodus. And by going around among the several tribes or bands got quite a following, and many families did start to seek summer in the south, and although the summer did return in due season, but did not bring back the families that went out to seek it, nor have they returned to this day. Their departure somewhat cast a gloom over the land. None of the old men would go, they warned those that were...
