It is known that the point A at the corner of the house B is on a true level with the cill of the window of the inn D at C: centre the telescope to that level in such a manner that the thread always cuts the same point pig. 917, when turned either way. The Spirit Level in general use, of the most convenient and improved form, has a telescope ah, supported at each end, and a spirit level below it, inclosed in a brass tube, with a piece of glass let in at the upper side, to observe the position of the air bubble: the instrument has a compass usually attached to it. By means of the socket F, and the screw below, the telescope may be raised or lowered at pleasure; on the plate M are four levelling screws,...
